Get Ready For Scrum!

Scrum is different. Management feels different. Development projects are difficult. I suspect also that a project when I was at a pharmaceutical company. Together, he congratulated him another company who had failing technology products. I think the development projects are difficult. I remember when a pharmaceutical company made a lot of money helping. He looked at me aghast, and said, "I'll never go through that again." It's never go back to just managing the project. His observation was that something was wrong; there must be a more straightforward way to build and implement systems.

Every project is different. The technology, the requirements, the people are different. Every time I've worked at a project, I've studied a variety of approaches to project management. Does Scrum work the way project management is supposed to work? To me, Scrum seems straightforward, relevant, and...
